Liquidating consequences of environmental violations and recovery of damage during oil transportation: topical issues of environmental protection

Keywords: Oil pipe; oil spill; notification; recovery of damage
Oil pollution is one of the most acute issues of environmental protection. However, it has not been thoroughly addressed by law which prompts a number of questions regarding law enforcement in this sphere. The law does not specify what parties should be informed on oil spills. What period of time is provided by law for due notification? What procedure will stipulate recovery of damage caused by oil spill? Should fines and penalties cover restorative works performed by maintenance organizations. The author attempts to analyze these vital issues of law.

A historical and comparative study of circumstantial evidence

Keywords: Evidence; circumstantial evidence; the presumption of law; the presumption of fact; sufficient evidence

This article presents a historical and comparative legal analysis of circumstantial (indirect) evidence. The author investigated causes for the appearance of circumstantial evidence and explored scientists' points of view on circumstantial evidence. The author believes that there is no single criterion to distinguish between direct and circumstantial types of evidence. However, distinction by facts established by evidence (ultimate fact or evidentiary) is the most useful for practice. An evidentiary fact is proved by circumstantial evidence, an ultimate fact — by direct evidence.
